Component 1 · Exercise 1 · 8 marks | syllabus 2027-2029

Learning focus

Skim the topic, scan for names and conditions, then give a short answer that fits the question.

The 0511 qualification includes Reading and Writing (50%), Listening (25%) and Speaking (25%). Each component is compulsory. These FagusED texts and tasks are newly written; the June 2026 materials supplied were consulted for page layout.

Skimming and scanning

Skim for the overall subject before hunting for details. Circle key words in the question, scan for a paraphrase in the text and reread the surrounding sentence. A date, reason and condition are different information types. The last question requires three distinct answers.

Worked example

“When may the students use the room?” → three afternoons a week, before the library closes at six. The answer to “why was the room useful?” is different: thick walls reduced noise.

Avoid near matches

Questions often place a tempting but wrong fact close to the right one. Check the timeframe and the person: the teacher visits Thursdays, while the library closes at six. Use one word or phrase for most answers.

Worked example

If asked what the caretaker advised, “open the small window safely and close it when leaving” is relevant; a fan was only a request.

Finding a place to practise

When Hana joined the school orchestra, she played her violin in the classroom after lessons. It was quiet there until a sports club began using the room next door. She could still hear herself, but she kept losing her place whenever the club opened its heavy door. At home, her younger brother was preparing for his own music exam, so they took turns using the living room.

Hana asked the music teacher about the empty room above the library. The teacher explained that the room was usually locked because it stored old chairs. Hana and two other students offered to help clear it. They worked for one Saturday morning, moving the chairs to a storage area with the caretaker's permission. The library manager then agreed that orchestra members could use the room three afternoons a week, provided they signed in and finished before the library closed at six.

At first, the new room seemed perfect. Its thick walls reduced the sound that reached the readers below. After a month, however, the students noticed that the room became warm and stuffy. They asked for a fan. Instead, the caretaker showed them how to open a small window safely and reminded them to close it before leaving. The manager also asked them to keep instrument cases away from the fire exit. No money was needed for either improvement.

The room has changed the way the group works. Hana says that regular practice has made it easier for her to perform short solos without stopping. She and the other students also listen to each other and give specific advice, rather than simply playing their own pieces. The teacher visits on Thursdays to help them prepare for their end-of-term concert.

The library manager is pleased with the arrangement, although she will review it after the concert. On one occasion, the group finished late and another member of staff had to wait to lock the building. Hana has therefore added a reminder to the sign-in sheet. She hopes the practice room will remain available to next year's orchestra, even when she has left the school.

Other students have already asked if they can book the room for different activities. The manager says the current agreement applies only to the orchestra, because the school must first check whether other groups would disturb readers. Hana thinks a simple weekly timetable might help everyone share the space. For now, she is concentrating on the concert and reminding her friends to leave the room as they found it.
